The Exhibition

The paintings, watercolors, and drawings of Edward Hopper (1882–1967) that are currently on exhibit in the East Building represent the first comprehensive survey of the artist’s career to be seen in American museums outside New York in more than twenty-five years. Focusing on the period of Hopper’s great achievements—from about 1925 to midcentury—the exhibition features the iconic paintings Automat (1927), Drug Store (1927), Early Sunday Morning (1930), New York Movie (1939), and Nighthawks (1942). Edward Hopper’s classic works capture the realities of urban and rural American life with a poignancy and beauty that have placed them among the most enduring and popular images of the twentieth century. The exhibition reveals Hopper as creator of compelling images who produced remarkably subtle and painterly effects in both oil and watercolor. Filmmakers and writers have responded to an implied narrative in the paintings that contain ambiguous relationships fraught with tension. The artist himself did not encourage such readings of his paintings, noting, “The loneliness thing is overdone.” He preferred to define his paintings in personal terms as when he wrote, “Great art is the outward expression of an inner life in the artist, and this inner life will result in his personal vision of the world.”

SYNOPSIS

New York City, early evening 1932

SCENE 1: An apartment in New York

Elaine O’Neill sits at a piano and prattles about her day while figuring out the notes to “Whadayasay?” a song from the new Broadway musical, Tell Me Tomorrow, which she and her husband Gus will see that evening. Gus reads the paper and ignores her, occasionally interjecting remarks about the news and his job as an account manager for an advertising firm. Suddenly, they realize they must get ready for the theater. While Gus leaves the room, Elaine admits to the estrangement in their marriage, despite the idyllic appearance of it from outside their apartment window. Gus reenters, begging off, and Elaine storms out. After she has left, Gus phones someone to meet him at his favorite bar, Clancy’s.

SCENE 2: A hotel lobby

Estelle Oglethorpe waits nervously for Mr. Cabral—her first date since the death of her husband, James. She looks out the hotel lobby window to the busy street that beckons her to move beyond her insular life in Greenwich.

SCENE 3: A street

Gus looks forward to Clancy’s, free from the frustrations of his home life and job, where he manages the advertising account for Pearladent toothpaste.

SCENE 4: A room in the Hudson Hotel for Young Women

Ruth Baldwin shuts off her radio, broadcasting the Pearladent jingle. She reads a letter she has just written to her boyfriend explaining that she is leaving him to move back to her family home in Indianapolis after a failed career as a dancer. She finishes her packing and stares out her one window for the last time. Ruth, Estelle, and Elaine (on her way to the theater), each convey their need to move on in their lives. Elaine leaves; Mr. Cabral arrives to accompany Estelle to the theater; Ruth shuts her suitcase and goes.

SCENE 5: The house of the Broadway theater where Tell Me Tomorrow plays
Rose and Sheldon Segal arrive at their seats and bicker, while Valentina Scarcella, an elegant woman from Parma who speaks very little English, sits reading her program. Elaine arrives; behind her is Jimmy O’Keefe, a young man visiting from Lynchburg to whom she has given her extra ticket. The usher, Thelma Yablonski, shows them to their seats. Joe Harland enters and tells Thelma that he is awaiting the arrival of his girlfriend, a dancer, and that he intends on proposing marriage this evening. Mr. Cabral and Estelle enter. The theater’s houselights dim. Jimmy expresses his excitement about his first Broadway show and his first week in New York. Suddenly, the overture to Tell Me Tomorrow strikes up. Not long after, Joe runs out of the theater. In a truncated sequence, the members of the audience watch the musical, conveying in their faces what is happening onstage. The house-lights come up and everyone files out of the theater. Valentina, speaking in Italian, vents her frustration at not comprehending the musical she has just seen—and life in this strange new country.

SCENE 6: The marquee

Elaine, Jimmy, Rose, Sheldon, Mr. Cabral, Estelle, and later Valentina huddle under the marquee during a pounding rain. On another street, Joe clutches the letter he just received from Ruth, devastated by her departure. Ruth, on a train nearing Philadelphia, regrets leaving New York, while Jimmy makes a decision to move to the city. The various pairings leave, sharing a cab or walking into the night alone. Elaine is about to go when Gus arrives inebriated. He breaks down to Elaine about his feelings of inadequacy as a husband. After a beat, she takes him home, chattering about the show.

SCENE 7: An automat

Thelma muses about her life and the odd excitement of the city. She is about to go home when Joe enters, telling her that his girlfriend left him. He offers to buy her a drink, then a cup of coffee; Thelma has to get home. Joe asks if he can walk her to the subway. She says, “Yes.” The rain has ended.
